

Errata Notes

Unfortunately errors occurred in our second issue, despite the great care taken by our editors and proofreaders.

Hugh F. Juergens, author of "Attributes of Information System Development," was listed in the table of contents as teaching at the University of Wisconsin-Milwaukee. Professor Juergens is at the Madison branch of the University of Wisconsin.

The first of our interviews was with Mr. Clark, Vice Chairman of Warnaco. Mr. Clark's first name was misspelled much to our embarrassment and should have appeared, Cameron Clark.

The last of our Theory and Research articles, "Determining Management Information Needs: A Comparison of Methods," by Malcolm C. Munro and Gordon B. Davis had a major problem. Please note that on page 65 in the Conclusions section, only the first two lines of copy for the first two points were printed. These should have been as follows:

1. Information analysis techniques cannot be considered apart from organizational contexts in which they are to be applied. Thus, efforts to improve, evaluate, test, research, or apply such techniques must be done so with respect to and in consideration of the organizational context.
2. Functional areas in organizations consist of different activities and such activities require different types of information. There is evidence that the differences among functional areas influence the effectiveness of information analysis techniques. This study does not permit statements about the appropriateness of specific techniques for particular functional areas, but it does provide clear indication that the effectiveness of techniques in terms of information value is different for different functional areas.

We sincerely apologize to Professor Juergens, Mr. Clark, and Professors Munro and Davis, and thank each of you for accepting these errors so good naturedly.

As with any endeavor, whether new or old, there's always room for improvement. We will, of course, do our best to tighten up our proofreading procedures to maintain ease of readability for you, our readers.
